Research on a Contemporary Artist

Before researching the work of an artist from the MFAH collection, the artist’s work should be viewed in the museum, if possible. The cultural context and descriptions of works in books and journals will be far more meaningful if you have taken advantage of this opportunity. Most good writing about art begins with careful inspections of the objects themselves, followed by informed library research. If the project includes the compiling of a bibliography, it will be most valuable if a full range of resources is consulted, including reference works, books, and journal articles. Listing on-line sources and survey books is usually much less informative.

To find articles in scholarly journals, use indexes such as Art Abstracts or, the Bibliography of the History of Art. Exhibition catalogs and books about the holdings of other museums may contain entries written about related objects that could also provide guidance and examples of how to write about art. To find books, use keywords in the on-line catalog. Once relevant titles are located, careful attention to how those items are cataloged will lead to similar books with those subject headings. Footnotes and bibliographies in books and articles can also lead to other sources. University libraries will usually offer further holdings on a subject, and the Electronic Resources Room in the library can be used to access their on-line catalogs.

Sylvan Barnet’s, A Short Guide to Writing About Art, 6th edition, provides a useful description of the process of looking, reading, and writing. For footnote and bibliography formats, the appendix in Barnet is helpful, as is Turabian’s Manual for Writers of Term Papers, which is available at the library’s reference desk.

For purposes of the bibliography listed below:
- Resources that are annotated Ref, or Reference are accessible on the main floor of the library.
- Ready Reference books are kept behind the information desk.
- For other books, give the titles and call numbers to a member of the library staff, who will retrieve the books for you.
- Books must be used in the library; they cannot be checked out.

Your assessment of the resources used in your research is always welcome.
