LA Jaula De Oro
“Seeds migrate on wings of the wind; plants migrate from one continent to another carried by ocean currents; birds and animals migrate; and above all collective and individual migrations as that of the human being, which even in the wake of catastrophe, made freely or due to necessity, winds toward its final goal, desirous of human fulfillment.”

-M. Scalabrini
SYNOPSIS

Three teenagers from the slums of Guatemala travel to the US in search of a better life. On their journey through Mexico they meet Chauk, an Indian from Chiapas who doesn’t speak Spanish. Travelling together in cargo trains, walking on the railroad tracks, they soon have to face a harsh reality.

DIRECTOR’S NOTES

The social reality in Latin America requires cinema to be deeply engaged with the world as it is. I am interested in making films firmly rooted in our contemporary society. True realism has it all: fantasy and reason, suffering and utopia, the happiness and pain of our existence. I want to give voice to migrants – human beings who challenge a system established by impassive national and international authorities by crossing borders illegally, risking their own lives in the hope of overcoming dire poverty.

This film is not a documentary, rather it is a fiction based on reality, reenacting it from a place of authenticity and integrity. We constructed the narrative and poetics of this odyssey from the testimony of hundreds of migrants and from the personal sentiments of each and every person who participated in the creative process.

As we identify with Juan and Chauk, we depart from our own daily lives and embark on a grand emotional adventure that delivers us to profound discovery – a journey dispelling the notion that happiness awaits us in a distant place, a journey offering reflection on the borders that divide nations, a journey towards awareness of what separates us as human beings.

We made this adventure in the hope of deconstructing those conventions that imprison us so we can reinvent our own reality. My dream is that these boundaries that separate us dissolve, allowing us to board another train. One whose destination doesn’t matter, a train whose passengers all know our all existence is interconnected, a train whose obstacles inspire us to celebrate our existence with respect and conscience that transcends nationalities, races, classes and beliefs.

The words of a Mexican man named Juan Menéndez López, spoken just before boarding a moving cargo train with seven of his companions, remains on my mind. “You learn a lot along the path. Here, we are all brothers. We all have the same need. What’s important is that we learn to share. Only in this way can we move ahead, only in this way can we reach our destination, only a united people can survive. As human beings, there is no place in the world where we are illegal.”
Guatemalans Brandon López (Juan) and Karen Martínez (Sara), 16 years old, were chosen for the lead roles for La Jaula de Oro out of a group of 3,000 young people who auditioned in a casting that took place in some of the poorest and most dangerous areas of Guatemala’s capital.

During his audition, Brandon’s ability to improvise, his potent gaze and talent for both verbal and non-verbal communication made him the protagonist. Besides acting in the film, Brandon is an up-and-coming figure on the Guatemalan hip-hop scene as an MC-DJ and breakdancer.

Karen has participated in street theater and performance art productions that focus on social issues in Guatemala, as well as acting in bit parts for staged plays. She is interested in developing her career as a professional actor.

We chose Rodolfo Domínguez, a 16-year-old young man of Tzotzil origin, to play the role of Chauk, building on his deep spiritual connection to earth, his indigenous culture, his charisma and his profound humanity. Rodolfo was discovered during castings held in a variety of remote villages scattered throughout the mountains of Chiapas. Rodolfo possesses a deep, artistic sensibility evoked through playing the harp and jarana guitar, as well as in the traditional dances and rituals of the Tzotzil people.
WHAT'S THE STORY BEHIND LA JAULA DE ORO?

In 2003, I had read an article about a red-light district in Mazatlan, and in a totally irrational move, I took a plane there, looking for my next story to tell. Once I got to this part of town, I met a taxi driver, “El Toto,” in one of the clubs there, and we became fast friends. I ended up living two months in his house, which was situated right next to some railroad tracks. Every single day, a convoy of train cars packed with migrants would arrive. These guys would hop off and come knock on the door asking for tortillas and water. They would tell us these terrible stories — how they were travelling with nothing, how they were robbed of everything on the way. Many died, nevertheless, they chucked it up to experience with the idea they would be making money and sending it to their families, sacrificing their lives for the people they loved. It seemed to me that they were heroes that their stories were like epic poems, their journeys metaphors for life - an extreme dramatization of human existence. I then spent several years collecting the stories from migrants. I met some wonderful people who taught me a lot of things, including generosity and the value of brotherhood.

I like going to a community and, through extensive research, discover which are the stories that want to be told — you assimilate them, you give them a dramatic structure, you drive the viewer to identify himself with what's happening to generate emotion. That's what gets you started, yearning to reach others. John ford spoke about this already in the thirties; he expected the concept with La Jaula de Oro was for us to make the journey that captures the wisdom of his people, so connected to the spiritual and poetic side of existence? I asked myself, “how can I try to capture and communicate the wisdom of his people, so connected to the spiritual and poetic side of existence?"

Another theme I address is the western obsession with progress and the fact that we don't know where it's leading us. We give so much attention to materialism, but what about spiritual and human development?" The kids never read the script. Every day, before we began, I would read them a little bit of the scene we were about to do. In this way they had a vital experience. We were putting them in situations without telling them what to do beforehand, encouraging them to live out what was happening around them. We encouraged the kids to talk about these issues.

The kids never read the script. Every day, before we began, I would read them a little bit of the scene we were about to do. In this way they had a vital experience. We were putting them in situations without telling them what to do beforehand, encouraging them to live out what was happening around them. We encouraged the kids to talk about these issues. When I began to work with Juan Loach, I told him the story of how I grew up in Guatemala, and how I discovered that the truth of my life was not in the words of my parents but in the stories of others. The concept with La Jaula de Oro was for us to make the journey that reaches others. John Ford spoke about this already in the thirties; he expected the characters of Juan and Chauk are molded from 500, 600 personal testimonies from migrants, as well as my own experiences, and feelings, plus the reality brought by the actors and the people who collaborated with the project. This turns into something very powerful. You maximize the act of communication from heart to heart, which, in this case, is to convey that these kids are heroes but also filled with humanity; they have flaws, they make mistakes. Maybe that's why it feels like there is something of truth in the soul of this film, because we all brought part of our own story to the project. We attempted to create one truth by bringing together many truths.

WHAT THEMES DO YOU EXPLORE IN THE FILM?

In many poor villages in Central America and in Mexico it seems that to embark on the adventure of risking your life going to the United States is like an initiation. For a lot of kids it's like being pulled out with the tide, like a current that drags you northward. They simply imitate what they have seen with their parents and relatives. We also wanted to call into question social, national and racial barriers. We are all equal, we all have the same needs, the same dream of a better life. Migration is natural and borders artificial, created by humans not so long ago.

There is to convey that these kids are heroes but also filled with humanity; they have flaws, they make mistakes. Maybe that's why it feels like there is something of truth in the soul of this film, because we all brought part of our own story to the project. We attempted to create one truth by bringing together many truths. In this way they had a vital experience.

The kids never read the script. Every day, before we began, I would read them a little bit of the scene we were about to do. In this way they had a vital experience. To me, what's interesting is to create a thin line between reality and film. Perfect filmmaking isn't that important to me. What is essential is capturing characters, a situation. I think each of us are not so important - we are all replaceable in some way. But what is important is our purpose, in my case I try to become a channel for other people’s stories. The fundamental purpose of this project is to communicate to others the true drama of migrants, from the feeling of the heart, in an intuitive way.

What is most interesting to me is the intersection of one's life and the lives of others. The characters of Juan and Chauk are molded from 500, 600 personal testimonies from migrants, as well as my own experiences, and feelings, plus the reality brought by the actors and the people who collaborated with the project. This turns into something very powerful. You maximize the act of communication from heart to heart, which, in this case, is to convey that these kids are heroes but also filled with humanity; they have flaws, they make mistakes. Maybe that's why it feels like there is something of truth in the soul of this film, because we all brought part of our own story to the project. We attempted to create one truth by bringing together many truths.

WHAT'S THE STORY BEHIND LA JAULA DE ORO?

In 2003, I had read an article about a red-light district in Mazatlan, and in a totally irrational move, I took a plane there, looking for my next story to tell. Once I got to this part of town, I met a taxi driver, “El Toto,” in one of the clubs there, and we became fast friends. I ended up living two months in his house, which was situated right next to some railroad tracks. Every single day, a convoy of train cars packed with migrants would arrive. These guys would hop off and come knock on the door asking for tortillas and water. They would tell us these terrible stories — how they were travelling with nothing, how they were robbed of everything on the way. Many died, nevertheless, they chucked it up to experience with the idea they would be making money and sending it to their families, sacrificing their lives for the people they loved. It seemed to me that they were heroes that their stories were like epic poems, their journeys metaphors for life - an extreme dramatization of human existence. I then spent several years collecting the stories from migrants. I met some wonderful people who taught me a lot of things, including generosity and the value of brotherhood.

I like going to a community and, through extensive research, discover which are the stories that want to be told — you assimilate them, you give them a dramatic structure, you drive the viewer to identify himself with what's happening to generate emotion. That's what gets you started, yearning to reach others. John ford spoke about this already in the thirties; he expected...
I think each of us we are not so important — we are all replaceable in some way. What is important is our function, in my case I try to become a channel for other people’s stories.

Little by little his armor falls away. He is transformed into someone different. He realizes that individualism is an illusion; a lie told by society, alone we can do nothing.

Another interesting thing about this structure of opposing worlds is that Juan represents the rational, the mind, and Chauk, the heart, the feeling. Over the course of their journey, Juan learns to feel. I wanted people to consider the content of the Tzotzil greeting, “K’uxi elan avo’onton?” (How is your heart?), to communicate on a more emotional level than just a mental processes. I think that inside all of us there is one part that is more like Juan and another that is like Chauk.

In human cinema you have literally a human point of view, the lens is always right at the height of a human being.

WHAT CAN YOU TELL US ABOUT THE METAPHORS PRESENT IN THE FILM?

The train is a metaphor for progress, a fundamental part of the assembly line in an industrial structure; it carries all of the raw materials need to feed the great machine and, in the most dehumanizing way possible, bringing cheap and utterly disposable labor. Migrants live in slave-like conditions within a system that proclaims to champion democracy and liberty.

DIEGO QUEMADA-DIEZ

Born in the Iberian Peninsula, raised in the Spanish cities of Burgos, Logroño and Barcelona, he has lived in the American continent for almost the past two decades.

His first job in the film industry was in 1995, in Ken Loach’s film Land and Freedom as a camera assistant to the director of cinematography. A year later, he migrated to the USA in order to film Things I Never Told You, (Cosas que Nunca Te Dije), Isabel Coixet’s second long-feature film and produced by Luis Miñarro.

he continued his career there, graduating in Cinematography at the American film Institute (AFI) with the Anthony Hopkins/Amex honorific scholarship. His graduation film as writer/director/DOP, A Table is a Table, won the Best Cinematography award given by the American Society of Cinematographers (ASC). Thanks to this award, he went on to work as Rodrigo Prieto’s camera operator in 21 Grams, directed by Alejandro González Iñárritu, which opened the doors for him so he could begin to work alongside film directors such as Fernando Meireles (The Constant Gardener), Tony Scott, Cesar Charlone, Oliver Stone and Spike Lee, among others.

In 2006, he premiered his second short film as screenwriter and director: I Want to be a Pilot, which after participating in the Sundance Film Festival, won more than fifty international awards. That same year he directed in Mexico his second documentary short film: La Morena. In 2010 he won one of the scholarships awarded by Cinéfondation, which enabled him to participate in the Cannes Film Festival Atelier and moved forward his first feature film, La Jaula de Oro.

FILMOGRAPHY

A Table is A Table (2001), short
I Want To Be A Pilot (2006), short
La Morena (2006), documentary short